Ashley McIver

From:

Lisa B. Nelson < lisanelson@alec.org>

Sent:

Wednesday, March 6, 2019 11:04 AM

To:

Kelly Townsend

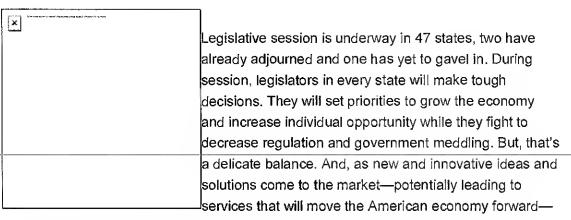

Subject:

CEO Update: Managing Creative Disruption in the States

CEO Update March 2019: Managing Creative Disruption in the States

Email not displaying correctly? View it in your browser.

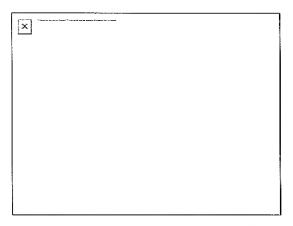

I'm hearing from legislators that they need help assessing policy because things are not always as they seem. There are plenty of disruptors out there, but markets need stability and people need a clear view of the future.

As the leading voice in free-market state policy, that is where ALEC comes in. ALEC—through substantive discussion—ensures legislators are equipped to manage the creative disruption at their doorstep.

Already this year the ALEC team has crisscrossed the country to make sure legislators have the right information—a framework upon which to base policy decisions that increase freedom and opportunity for all people.

ALEC policy experts have been educating on academic free speech issues in Arkansas, Oklahoma and Mississippi; donor privacy in Oklahoma; lawsuit reform in Missouri; criminal justice issues in Maryland and South Carolina; critical infrastructure protection in Illinois, Missouri, Ohio, Mississippi, Indiana, North Dakota and Wyoming; and, income tax issues in Arizona and Wyoming to name just a few areas of relevance this session.

It might seem cut and dry: Students should be able to test academic boundaries on campus, donors should have the right to privacy around their contributions and speech (think about the Federalist Papers). But it's not always that simple. The trend of government is to expand and to regulate, and ALEC legislators stand in the breach to defend and promote the policies that create opportunity and respect hardworking taxpayers absent government.

There are examples this session that prove the point: In Arizona, Governor Ducey vetoed legislative efforts to provide substantial tax relief for hardworking taxpayers. Many states are taking advantage of resources brought to state budgets via recent federal tax reform, but for now, Arizona sits on the sidelines. In Wyoming, the House introduced legislation that would create the state's first business income tax of seven percent that would be discriminatory towards many of the states's retailers and franchisees. There are no permanent victories, but there are also no permanent defeats. And, ALEC legislators and policy experts meet each challenge head on to preserve opportunity for the people.